We have been happy here; fair flying days
Yield now sweet mem'ries far more dear than gold;
We have sung songs, wove dreams, and felt the old,
Brave thrill of human friendship; trod loved ways
Once passed by long-gone others, felt the blaze
Of quick born powers, and with a youth grown bold
Have challenged Life its mysteries to unfold:
And thou hast crowned our brows with more than bays.

All this is ended; we shall see no more
Gay sunsets gild these dear celestial walls;
Next springtime all will be as we were not,
And others crowd where once we thronged before.
We love thee, dear old school; though all else falls,
We love thee still. Shall we be soon forgot?

Senior Prom

Essex House

December 5, 1958

It was a windy, cold night, but no form of nature's disposition could mar the radiance of the couples entering Essex House.

Quietly, but with dazzling sophistication they stepped into the Oxford-Cambridge room, greeted the faculty and their friends, and took their places at the tables. All were immediately engulfed in the romantic atmosphere which the orchestra set with its soft music, playing against the beautiful background of the glimmering ballroom, with its shimmering candelabra and deeply carpeted floors. Everything was expressed in excited whispers, for anything above a whisper did not seem proper.

Each couple, in finest array of formal attire, was entrancing. The girls wore yards and yards of chiffon and net with corsages of delicate orchids and roses. The boys in their tuxedos were extra-handsome on this festive occasion.

After eating the sumptuous meal which was served to us, we again settled back to relaxed conversation. The hours were fleeting, but no one seemed to take any cognizance of that fact. The music was so inviting that teachers joined the students in the dancing, and Mr. and Mrs. Ackerman's dance was enjoyed by all.

As the music began the Promenade, everyone slowly joined the circling couples. The climax came when the king and queen were chosen. Their glow of happiness bedazzled even the most glamorous of tiaras worn by the girls.

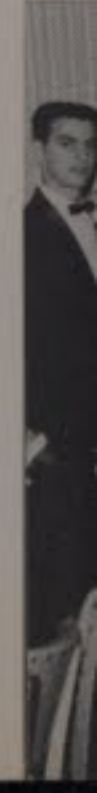

Then as the music began its final melodic strains, we found that our prom had too quickly come to an end, and soon the ballroom would be empty. However, no one was ready to go home yet, the destination of most Seniors was New York, and its gay and exciting night life.

But, quickly, much too quickly, the hours went by. Home, with the souvenirs of our exciting prom, we settled down, our thoughts filled with beautiful, endearing "Moments to Remember".
